Addressing Special Issues Of Classic Vehicles

If you have a Jaguar made in the heyday of the popularity of the Jaguar after World War II or later, your ability to show the car at classic car rallies depends on making repairs that do not compromise the original vehicle or alter it in any way. Working on classic cars requires skills and a commitment to put in the amount of time required to repair it, while using original or authentically restored parts.

If you are going to drive your classic Jaguar, you might want to bring it up to modern safety standards. For better braking, for example, you might want the braking system upgraded by having the technician convert drum brakes to disc brakes, or adding a vacuum servo to make braking easier. Whomever you entrust with your car should be willing to do the research to make the repairs right, so as not to inadvertently devalue your classic car. Replacing tires, adding seatbelts, or making other repairs are more problematic if you don't want to affect the drivability of the car or lose points at car shows. Cherry Park Automotive will help you protect your investment by doing maintenance and repairs correctly.
